Few things are as unpleasant as divorce and when it comes to divorce where children are involved, it gets even worse. The big question regarding who is going to get custody of the children rears its head and difficulties often ensue. Who is the best one to raise the children and how can this be amicably determined? Fighting to Maintain Custody of Children

Today, more than ever, parents are fighting to maintain custody of their children. And while it's good to know that both parties want the children, the desire for each to raise children can turn child custody cases into a royal battle. When it comes to child custody, there is either Sole Managing Conservatorship or Joint Managing Conservatorship. Sole Managing Conservatorship is when a court decrees that one parent over another should be the sole manager regarding the child. In Joint Managing Conservatorship, the rights, privileges, duties and powers of a parent is shared, even if the exclusive power to make certain decisions is awarded to one party. This does not mean that there will be equal periods of physical possession of the child.
